The film is about the life of an Ex-Militant of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), who is arrested by Indian Army and imprisoned in Tihar Jail. The film shows how the conflict is hurting the lives of people in a year of peace. He won the National Film Award for Best Popular Film Providing Wholesome Entertainment for the year. Since this is not in the nature of any kind of a journalism, it might be somewhat high-handed to call it an article, but on the other hand the subject, Sri Lanka, is of such immediate interest that its desirability justifies the adoption of this unconventional method. (read on) First things first. * I do not intend to write a review of the movie or a detailed analysis of its political connotations. My job is simply to try and convey the sense that a number of the people I met during my stay in Sri Lanka in the early eighties remember that visit vividly. I will try to put things in the correct context, which is also the context they were placed in when I visited. That means that I have to leave the fanciful, speculative arguments, analyses and comparisons to the political theorists and their readers. I will try to be fairly brief. However, I feel the urge to set out my impressions of the country as it was then. I hope, that my account will be useful to those who are not interested in the politics of the conflict. I take it for granted that anyone reading this will have at least some idea of the civil war that has ravaged the country for almost twenty years. The conflict began in December of 1983. When I came to Sri Lanka on January 4, 1985, I came with the intention of staying for some time. By that time, the conflict had dragged on for three years, though it had flared up intermittently for almost two years before I left. I spent more than a month in Colombo and its suburbs. I also spent about a week in Jaffna. I spent another week in the north and the east. I also visited a few places in the south. I 82157476af
